

A new Author, a New Book

The City of Dreams is a different book. It is the story of four children and teens and their parents, struggling with the fact that each of them is a deeply regressive baby. They want diapers, baby clothes and all the trappings of genuine infancy. Like so many before them, the battle is hard, frustrating and carried out largely alone. Until...

A clinical psychologist appears on the scene and is offering not therapy, but a way of life in a walled-off, gated community. The school takes only regressive and diapered children and in this unique place, offers them a chance to discover themselves, express their inner babies and prepare themselves better for the world after school.

It is a wonderful story of possibilities, of the innocence of youth and the trappings of immersive infancy. You will be left wishing that such a place really existed and that you had been a student there.

A recommended read...

In a similar vein to The City of Dreams, we would like to recommend to you the true story of Andrew Stevens, a boy who grew up wanting to stay in nappies and... to be a baby girl.

A beautifully written book, Me, Myself, Christine chronicles Andrew's rare experience of meeting another teen baby like himself during his school years and a sissy baby at that. We follow his journey across the years and eventually the decades, as he discovers the baby girl within, and the privilege it is to know and understand another whose journey paralleled his own.
